Sky isn't falling, Pridemore says in State of County address, just gradually lowering

While he declared in his State of the County Address today that the state of Clark County remains good, commission chair Craig Pridemore added, "Barring a significant change in how we fund county government, or a significant change in how we develop the future of this community, however, we have now begun a downward spiral with literally no end in sight."

Pridemore's three topics were declining per-capita tax income, economic development, and growth management.

The county's share of property and sales tax revenues of about 3 percent per year doesn't match an increase in general fund spending of 5 percent a year, according to Pridemore. "We have already begun scaling back our road construction and community planning efforts," he said, adding, "the impacts to our criminal and civil justice system have begun, and they will get worse."

On the economic bright side is the county's just completed Public Service Center, according to Pridemore. The center will save the taxpayers $46 million dollars in rent during the life of its 25-year mortgage.

The county's number one priority over the past two years has been economic development, according to Pridemore. Some of the things on Pridemore's list of county achievements are:

- With the Columbia River Economic Development Council and other private and public agencies, it developed countywide economic development policy for inclusion in the county comprehensive plan.
- It dedicated 50 percent of a real estate excise tax add-on for public improvements that spur economic development.
- It entered a partnership with the City of Vancouver to help finance the city's downtown convention center.
- It made a commitment to make full use of the Clark County railway line.
- It developed a 90-day permitting process for projects of economic significance.

Pridemore promised that the county's comprehensive plan update will be finished by Dec. 31, 2003.

The commissioner said, "While it's premature to say exactly what the final plan will look like...we are heading in a direction of being considerably less encouraging of expansive residential sprawl, but considerably more supportive of economic development and jobs growth...What we are trying to do is nothing short of revolutionary. We are trying to turn the direction of a thirty-year-old path of development in Clark County."
