County takes hits in court

Clark County commissioners this week approved a series of court claims, the largest of which was $700,000, to conclude a mediated settlement with Kimberly Kennedy.

A 13-year-old boy shot and killed Kennedy's husband and wounded her, after he had learned he had been named a suspect of molesting Kennedy's then nine-year-old daughter. A Ridgefield police officer had notified the suspect's mother of the allegation.

Commissioners authorized payment of $50,000 to John William Hager III, who was attempting to elude pursuing police vehicles when a deputy sheriff's pistol accidentally discharged wounding him in the shoulder.

Commissioners agreed to pay William G. Kraft $22,500 for his having been inadvertently kept in jail 12 days longer than his sentence called for.

Commissioners offered a judgment of $17,500 to Dino Vichas, who claimed he had been falsely arrested in June 1999 for rendering criminal assistance to his son, by not having called the police as instructed when the son, wanted

Caught again

This week we wrongly reported that the Clark College Foundation had been searching for a new president for nearly a year, when actually the formal search to find a replacement for former president Elson Strahan, who resigned to become president of the Fort Vancouver Historic Reserve Trust this March, was conducted in just over 90 days.

It was Ed Geiger, owner of The Experience Network, an executive search organization and also a member of the college foundation board, who gently laid the truth on us. Geiger, by the way, did not vote on the selection, because it was his company that elicited the 89 responses for the position.
