Paper vanishing from SWMC Radiation Therapy Department

Cheri Grove's Southwest Washington Medical Center Radiation Oncology Department becoming paperless

Southwest Washington Medical Center's Radiation Therapy Department is 80 percent paper free today, and the goal is to reach 100 percent by next summer, reports Cheri Grove, manager of the department.

The paperless system is run off a software program called IMPAC, which is also used in the Medical Oncology Department.

Now anyone on the staff can access nearly all information from a patient's chart from computer terminals all around the department.

Grove says the move to a paperless system has increased efficiency and productivity, decreased supply costs and improved the way the department tracks patient data. "And," she says, "We spend a lot less time filling out paper work and tracking down patient charts," she says.

According to Grove, adapting to a paperless environment has been a successful team effort involving brainstorming and good communication. "Once we got over the initial fear [that comes with change]," she explains, "we discovered we have a user-friendly system and that we can't erase anything."

Grove says the department has eliminated over ten thousand pieces of paper since switching over to electronic patient records.

Vancouver gets CREDC encomium for system that 'really works'

At its annual meeting last week, the Columbia River Economic Development Council, declaring that the City of Vancouver has streamlined the permitting process with a program that "really works," presented the city with the CREDC Pillar of Excellence in Economic Development Award.

The first-ever award was for the city's 90-day streamlined permitting process. Said Bart Phillips, CREDC president: "The review committee had unanimous praise for the city's efforts to develop an expedited permitting process [and was] impressed with their philosophy of continuous improvement and with their commitment to developing a system that really works."

Vancouver is a good place in which to do business, Phillips added.

two-year national Port Environmental Management Systems Assistance Project.

Joined by the Port of Los Angeles, the west coast ports will work with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, Port of Houston Authority, Virginia Port Authority, Port of Corpus Christi, the Port of New Orleans and Port Everglades in a study sponsored by the Environmental Protection.

The participants are expected to develop a set of management processes that will help organizations analyze, control and improve environmental consequences.

"The Port of Vancouver has a long history of environmental stewardship, including annual audits, protective lease language, and responsible mediation of inherited cleanup sites," says Larry Paulson, executive director of the Port of Vancouver.
