Statewide high-tech industry competitive initiative would boost Clark County economy

The Columbia River Economic Council today called for a statewide high-tech industry competitiveness initiative to boost both Clark County's and the state's economy.

Washington's decreasing competitiveness, as compared with other national and global locations, inhibits active recruiting in the semiconductor industry, according to CREDC president Bart Phillips.

Phillips says that expansion of the semiconductor industry would have significant impact on the state as well as Clark County.

The majority of that high-tech segment is located in Clark County. Washington semiconductor companies employed 3,532 workers and had a $180 million payroll in 2001.

Estimates are that, over the next ten years, high-tech investments could exceed $2 billion and contribute to a $500 million payroll, if Washington is successful in providing the right kind of enticements for the semiconductor industry.

Key components of a competitiveness initiative are property tax exemptions on equipment, sales tax reductions and tax credits, according to Phillips.

Clark County filling up

Clark Public Utilities reported another 351 residential hook-ups for November, bringing the total number of new residential customers for the first 11 months of 2002 to 4,166.

Although residential growth has been growing at a rate of 3.09 percent over the past year, total residential electric consumption has been declining and has been under budget for most of the year.

People

Paul Winters and Philip Parker have been appointed to Vancouver's Public Facilities District Board. They succeed Byron Hanke, who has been elected as a Clark Public Utilities commissioner, and David Nierenberg, who earlier resigned to devote more energy to activities in the Evergreen School District area.
