Jeanne Lipton is after Mayor Royce Pollard's job a second time; this time it's all or nothing

Vancouver city councilmember Jeanne Lipton will run in November for Mayor Royce Pollard's job.

The outspoken councilmember was elected to her first four-year term in 1999. Two years later, when she tried to replace Pollard as mayor she lost by a nearly two votes to one, but did not have to give up her council seat. This time is different. Lipton cannot run for both positions.

Lipton says, "Either he goes or I go," reports Jeff Mize, Columbian staff writer in this morning's edition.

The outspoken mayor, who has not announced his candidacy, shrugs his shoulders.

Southwest Washington Medical Center employees' $52,000 gift boosts hospice house project to within $100,000 of goal

Hospice Southwest's hospice house project got a $52,000 shot in the arm from Southwest Washington Medical Center employees this week, bringing the hospice house within $100,000 of its $3 million goal.

The hospice house will provide 20 private rooms where families can visit any time, day or night, a kitchen where family and friends can cook special meals, a quiet space for family counseling, an art and activities room, and a sanctuary/spiritual center.

Hospice Southwest, a medical program, provides care for the terminally ill and their families, offering pain and symptom management, medical treatment, and emotional and spiritual support.

Jackie Brown, chair of the medical center's employee giving program, says the employees responded to the challenge by surpassing their $50,000 goal within three months.

Lynn Bohart director of the Southwest Washington Medical Center Foundation which launched the campaign, says construction is expected to begin this spring.
