Insider readers say they prefer a nonpartisan primary election system

By slightly over two to one, Daily Insider readers who participated in this week's survey of their preferences for primary election systems gave first place votes for a nonpartisan open primary system that would allow voters to cross political party lines to vote for candidates of their choice. Under this kind of system, they would not be required to disclose their party preference, if any.

Last week Washington's 70-year-old blanket primary, which gave voters choices of all candidates regardless of party affiliation, was laid to rest when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear the state's appeal to maintain the current system.

It's now up to the legislature to enact new primary election laws, or at least an interim system, in time for the September 2004 primary.

At the recommendation of State Reps. Bill Fromhold (D-49th), Jim Moeller (D-49th) and Deb Wallace (D-17th), the Daily Insider polled its readers on choices, ranging from caucuses and conventions to a nonpartisan system very much like that dismissed by the Supreme Court.

The results of responses from 113 readers were tabulated today.

Some of the most vocal responses came from those whose first choice was that primary voters should declare their party and be restricted to voting only for candidates of that party. But they were in the minority.

Unrestricted primary systems got 80 first-place votes in the poll, while primary systems restricted to party voters got 33 first-place votes.

When first-, second- and 3rd-place votes were added, 190 votes were cast on the unrestricted side, and 108 on the side restricted to party.

Neither the state representatives who asked for the poll nor the Insider claim that the poll of Insider readers reflects any constituency beyond the readers who responded.

Fromhold from Olympia today said that other polls have produced results similar to the Insider poll, likewise favoring an open primary.

Fromhold said that, while both open and closed primaries currently are being discussed among legislators, at least for now he favors an open primary.
