YWCA expanding volunteer base to serve increasing numbers of people in need

The YWCA of Clark County, founded in 1916, served an estimated 30,000 women, children and families last year, and the number is growing.

The local Y has about 150 volunteers who serve as court appointed special advocates for abused and neglected children, according to Al Flory, the organization's director of volunteer development.

Last year, volunteers handled 660 cases of abused, neglected and abandoned children before the courts. "We need an additional 30 volunteers to handle the growing numbers of these children in Clark County," Flory says.

The YWCA is kicking off its spring 2004 recruitment and training cycle with a volunteer orientation at 6 p.m. Tuesday, April 13, in the agency's community room, 3609 Main Street.

The orientation is free and reservations are not required.

The YWCA has 75 to 80 full- and part-time employees, whose work is augmented by some 250 volunteers serving on an annual basis, and up to 700 volunteers who perform short-term chores, such as working with the May 1, annual benefit auction.

Volunteers being sought in particular to fill positions in several categories of service will be given 30 to 35 hours of training, according to Flory.

The SafeChoice domestic violence victim support program is served by 30 to 35 volunteers and needs more volunteers. SafeChoice provided over 10,000 bed-nights in the agencies 28-unit shelter.

More sexual assault victim advocates for adults and children are needed to serve that growing population. Last year, Y volunteers provided counseling, support and advocacy for 2,200 individuals.

WORTH volunteers, volunteers who devote two hours a week visiting women in local jails, are being sought to provide assistance to an estimated 1,200 women who will be inmates in local jails this year.

And volunteers are being sought as mentors to help provide living skills for young people who are emerging from foster care.
