Ridgefielders pass school levy big time, Oregonians smother income tax bailout

BY TAUF CHARNESKI

Staff Writer The Insider

Nearly 42 percent of the registered voters in the Ridgefield School District cast ballots in yesterday's special election, giving the district's $7.9 million special levy proposal a whopping 69.01 percent majority.

Meanwhile, voters in Oregon trounced Measure 30, which would have raised $800 million in state income tax to pay for, among other things, public school operations. The defeat of the measure triggers over $500 million in cuts in Oregon's schools, public safety and human services.

Even Multnomah County voters rejected Measure 30, after having in last May given their approval to a local income tax increase essentially targeted to schools. Statewide, the measure was losing by 59 percent to 41 percent.

Does this mean that Oregon voters are more mean-spirited than those in Ridgefield?

No. Ridgefield voters were more enlightened than those in Oregon.

Ridgefield voters were much better informed about their school district's needs than Oregon voters were informed about what the $800 million bailout would produce.

Voters, and that includes you, dear reader, and me, are much smarter and much more knowledgeable than some people give them credit for.

If we are given a proposition that is unambiguous and clearly explained we can make a decision—for or against. When we face a proposition that is not clearly spelled out, it's pretty hard to come to a positive conclusion.

Congratulations to the Ridgefield School District and its supporters for a job well done.

Let's hope that the backers of the March 9 Fort Vancouver Regional Library District's proposed $48 million bond issue do as good a job of informing us about the need for updated library facilities and services as the backers of the Ridgefield schools did for their voters.
