Thousands cheer as Legacy Salmon Creek Hospital opens

Robert Pallari, CEO/president of Legacy Health System Saturday, with help from Vancouver Mayor Royce Polard and Clark County commissioner chair Betty Sue Morris, dedicated Legacy Salmon Creek Hospital Saturday.

Jonathan Avery, is administrator of new Legacy Salmon Creek Hospital, which will begin accepting patients next Monday.

An estimated 3,000 people toured the newest hospital built in this state in 27 years and heard speeches dedicating the $275 million Legacy Salmon Creek Hospital, which will accept its first patients next Monday.

In construction the past two years at 211 NE 139th Street, the hospital will provide the Northwest Clark County with 151 private patient rooms, including 15 intensive care units in the medical facility's state-of-the-art neonatal intensive care section.

Legacy Health Systems president and CEO Robert Pallari, on whose watch Legacy Salmon

Creek Hospital was conceived, said that Portland health care providers had long coveted Clark County. We were the first to commit to being part of Clark County four years ago, and "Today we have become part of the community."

The new hospital will employ about 600 full- and part-time people, about a third of whom were Legacy Health System employees who worked in Oregon but live in Clark County.

Port of Portland commissioners set to adopt airport noise rules

Port of Portland commissioners, meeting at 9 a.m. Wednesday, Aug. 10, in the St. Helens conference room at Portland International Airport, are expected to approve aircraft noise regulations that will be sent on to the Federal Aviation Administration for final approval.

Vancouver organizations sought but did not obtain much relief from overhead noise generated by incoming and departing flights across the Columbia River from the Portland airport.
