Mosquitoes swarming, but most don't carry West Nile virus

High runoff this spring has contributed to an abundance of mosquito-breeding water in Clark County, according to the Clark County Mosquito Control District.

These floodwater mosquitoes are aggressive and travel long distances, creating misery for inadequately clothed outdoor enthusiasts not wearing insect repellent, says Mosquito Control District operations manager Steve Kessler.

The good news is that floodwater mosquitoes do not carry diseases, and they are 98.5 percent of the mosquito population. The other 1.5 percent are culex mosquitoes, and they are capable of transmitting West Nile Virus.

The mosquito district has treated 1,000 acres of floodwater breeding areas with larvacide and is now targeting the culex variety, according to Kessler. For further information, call 397-6012.
